VICE PRINCIPAL'S CORNER Mr. Michael Viernes

Attending school offers many opportunities. One is the social aspect. Children learn how to interact with different people, make friends, resolve conflicts, and also learn how to get along.

One of the many important lessons about socialization is learning about gossip and rumors.

Children need to be taught that spreading rumors is unacceptable. Spreading gossip and rumors is really a form of bullying and needs to be taken seriously. Rumors can affect a child's reputation, ability to make friends, interactions with peers, teachers, and parents, and damage a child's self-esteem. While we want to give our children the tools to combat social pressures and learn to cope, as parents we may also need to intervene and let other adults know what is going on if rumors and gossip are getting out of control.

At the same time, we need to teach our children what gossip and rumors are. This can be difficult if we are doing it ourselves! If our kids hear us talking about other people and "telling stories" or sharing gossip with others, they will just assume that it is okay and normal to behave like that. We need to set very clear examples and expectations letting our kids know that spreading rumors or gossiping or saying negative things about other children is not okay. Our children need to know how powerful that sort of behavior can be and how detrimental it can be to other children.
